POETRY

THE NEW DRIVE.

But still the children cry for bread.
To you and rie;
And still the children die for bread.
Over the sea.
Brothers and sisters, fathers and prothers,
What shall our answer be?

"I am tired of drives,
And of begging, too;
What are allen lives
To me and to you?
I am weary of asking
And weary of giving.
And I think we might have
Some peace of loving!"

But Hunger is never weary, friend; Death tires never; No moment's pause or check In their endeaver; Bruthers and sisters, fathers and methers, Must they win ever?

"We gave our best, we won the war,
And that was enough;
No need to roam; there are plenty at
Who are not well off.
Let charity stay
Where charity starts
Nor waste more tressure
On 'foreign parts.'"

But still the children cry for bread To you and me: And still the children die for bread Over the sea. Brothers and sixters, fatbers and mothers, What shall our answer he? —Laura R. Richards, in Boston Tran-script.

BRIDGE AND MOONLIGHT. Suddenly, at a gap in the curtains.
The Moon shone through;
A little slip of a moon it was,
So young and new;
But to us in the mellow lamp lit room
That slien light
Seemed to come as the cold remembrance
Of ultimate Night.

For a moment the players forgot their game.

Their trumps and aces:
The blood ran interping home to the heart From tie mirth flushed faces;
Then eye met questioning eye, and still No word was stoken.
Till a woman said, "What a levely Moon!"

And the weell was broken.

And the spell was broken.
